

kehlani.

an essay.

kehlani.

“hey..if you see these signs [of] i’m not sleeping, i’m not eating, i’m talking really fast...i’m in crisis.”

kehlani on living with a bipolar & bpd diagnosis.

an essay.

kehlani.

an essay.

when creating our central character..

we wanted her name to stand for something deeply intentional. named after r&b star kehlani (and pulitzer prize poet gwendolyn brooks)..

..inspired by the singer's raw honesty in opening up about her clinical diagnosis to spark conversations around black mental health.

our show pulls back the curtain on a reality too often masked by silence. for this demographic, a crisis doesn't always look like falling apart. swipe for a perspective, and the signs you can't ignore.

kehlani.

an essay.

the inspo. in kehlani's words.

the reality: "people think a diagnosis is relief... but sometimes it just makes everything real. it's the beginning of a whole different kind of fight."

the non-negotiable routine: "i am clinically bipolar... i take medicine. i have to go to the gym; it's not an option. i have to have a routine supporting my wellness so i can freaking survive."

the lifeline: "hey, if you see these signs [of] i'm not sleeping, i'm not eating, i'm talking really fast...call my psychiatrist. i'm in crisis."

kehlani.

an essay.

our core intent & mission.

the mission: shifting the narrative away from silent, isolated suffering and toward structural, community-supported healing.

the intent: to bring awareness to the layered nuances of black female mental health.

dismantling the mask: exposing the heavy psychological toll of the "strong black woman" stereotype that forces resilience at the cost of wellness.

kehlani.

an essay.

crisis looks different here.

the traditional view: society expects a mental health crisis to look like sudden public breakdowns or total exhaustion.

the high-functioning trap: for black women, an emotional or manic crisis often presents as extreme over-functioning.

the mask: hyper-productivity, saying yes to everything, stepping into every room, and moving way too fast for anyone to notice the pain.

kehlani.

an essay.

roadmap. signs to look for.

unusual energy shifts: days without sleep or eating, paired with sudden, uncharacteristic bursts of intense productivity.

pressured patterns: noticeably rapid, urgent, or continuous speech during high-stress periods.

the action step: don't wait for a total collapse. build a crisis roadmap with your circle early, and intentionally check in on your high-functioning friends.

kehlani.

an essay.